Some Muslims in Britain would like to send their children to Islamic schools, which teach the same subjects as the national curriculum but only take Muslim students. Some politicians in the Conservative Party have opposed such schools, arguing that they encourage the segregation of Muslims from mainstream British society and that many teachers in such schools promote extremist views. Some Muslim parents in Britain would like to send their children to Islamic schools, which teach the same subjects as the national curriculum but only take Muslim students. Some politicians in the Conservative Party have opposed such schools, arguing that they encourage the segregation of Muslims from mainstream British society and that many teachers in such schools promote extremist views.

Others have criticised this viewpoint, saying that such concerns are the product of negative stereotypes about British Muslims, who overwhelmingly reject extremism. They point out that Roman Catholic and Anglican parents have used religious schools for decades, and that it would be discriminatory to deny Muslim parents the same choices for their children. Do you agree or disagree that Muslims in Britain should be allowed to send their children to Islamic schools.
